War Happens when Language fails

Language: Weaving the Tapestry of Emotions

Language or the splendour array of words is ~~are~~ what which binds the complex precarious minds of hundreds of humans. As the famous saying goes 'Art is in the eye of the beholder', the word language upholds numerous meanings - language can be linguistic, emotional or something as enigmatic as the human mind. 'War happens when language fails' - are they political wars aiming for the blood of innocents or is it something else?

When we talk about languages are they just the complex, different and musical words we speak - certainly not. When we think about languages we think of the misspoken words that may lead to wars and yes, those incomplete syllables does end up in disputes. Enormous never ending wars certainly breaks out due to miscommunication between countries, humans and even ^{among} the finest insects.

Language is something that links us living beings together. Beauty of words, poetry, ^{even} the casual talks among your peers gives us a sense of belonging as we can say that language is not something verbal it is the mutual understanding. Language is something we take for granted - language doesn't have to be a thesis on modern romance to make your lover understand the unseen depth of love and respect you have. Language certainly doesn't have to be a Shakespearean Sonnet to make the other one understand your emotions. Language is something that everyone of us has a different view on - The touch of love from your mother when you are sick, the unspoken understanding between you and your friends in the exam hall, the language of love when your grandparents hand you money, making us promise not to tell our parents are such examples.

Languages are like Jekyll and Hyde which has a dual nature. If not used properly, the magnificent blade that implies to the beauty of life may be the ^{horrendous} murderer. Language which isn't used properly is as same as a baby with a knife, it becomes the catalyst for a catastrophe language when is misused it can lead to irreversible shifts in one's life. It may lead to political and emotional wars. One slip of tongue and a whole race is under the soil. Miscommunications, border disputes and even the humorous comments can lead to deaths of thousands of innocent. The Emotional Wars - these are the most destruction causing and it leaves a scar that takes up centuries to heal, the language fails - miscommunications, the foolishness of the tauturn kills the perfect and incandescently beautiful connections.

In my opinion, the so-called linguistic and verbal wars that ends a perfectly knitted sweather into a messy, chaotic useless yarns are the severing of a beautiful symphony of emotions two individuals shared. As we say Art is in the eye of the beholder, my idea of language is just the emotional attachment one can share being someone who rarely opens up it never fails to ^{me}amaze ^{me}. The idea of a perfect language and communication. Languages or the way of communication is subjective.

Language is something ~~that~~ ^{that} will also make us believe the impossible is possible the idea it creates among the individual itself is also a war of its own. The propagation of language when it is meant by languages, the idea of propagation of events - the untrue new headlines, scams and many more. The ideology of 'war' which is mainly related to resource deficiency, losing of lives - the Humanitarian Crisis, Economic depression is also due to 'the language'. The complex idea of war and language here remains as a conundrum.

Something as complex as ^{not} just a simple arrangement of phrases is a language and yes, the languages differ in their comprehension, usage. Something that is similar to the sorcery of voices and as important as the air we breathe. Their profound implications are something we humans need to discuss. The influence of language and words are what which helped us reach here. As far as it's failure being considered a war is utter foolishness. Language - may it be linguistic or may it be emotional, cultural or any other genre, it is what brought us here.

helping us communicate. The effect of this ~~one~~ delicacy of words on our life is unimaginatively humungous.

If we tell a big enough lie, it is certain that people shall believe it.
